Gentlemen;

First, I would like to ask the commission how it came to the conclusion the customers in your area should be asked to build buildings for their utility company. They buy electricity from the utility company hopefully at a reasonable price. What the Company does with their profits is of no interest. What were the members thinking?

Secondly, as an architect, throughout my career have let numerous large-scale contracts, both for public and private facilities, and never have I let a contract that was not bonded. Had the project been bonded the insurance company would have immediately finished the project, no questions asked, no lose to the public. You are going to tell me it was too expensive and the bonding was waived. It would not have been too expensive for Lloyds.

I would suggest you might need to investigate bonding law and your legal team as well as the Architectural/Engineering firm. As you see, it is very hazardous for a client not to have a project protected. If the project was difficult to get bonded you should have insisted multiple bonding companies or broken the project up into multiple smaller projects.

A design company that would allow a client get by without bond, particularly a public project, is incompetent. Something is fishy! It has been my experience in South Carolina, there is a terrible amount of corruption among engineers and architects when it involves large-scale projects. Your members should have know this and been prepared for it...

I really would appreciated a copy of what your investigation turns up !

Sincerely,

/s/Robert Johnson,
